

INJURED WHEN SHE IS STRUCK BY STREET CAR

Mrs. J. H. Little, 2320 Ninth Avenue, Rendered Unconscious From Force of Blow.

Mrs. J. H. Little, 2320 Ninth avenue, was painfully injured when a street car struck her at Third avenue and Sixteenth street, about 7:45 o'clock last night.

She was one of several people who were standing on the curb at Sixteenth street waiting for a bridge line car. When they stepped out to the track to board the car, a Fourth avenue car which was in front, backed up, it is said, without warning and turned the corner at Third avenue. Mrs. Little was standing near the track and she was thrown to the pavement when the rear end swung around and struck her. She was rendered unconscious from the blow, and was removed to her home in the police ambulance.

It was thought at the time that she was severely injured, but an examination revealed that no bones were broken. She will be out in about a week.

PROPER COOKING KILLS MENACING POISON IN FOODS

BY DR. F. W. TANNER
(Associate Professor of Bacteriology of University of Illinois.)

All home canned foods should be thoroughly cooked before serving. Comparatively recent investigations show that botulism, an acute food poisoning, may result from foods put up under the so-called "cold-pack" process, unless the canned foods are carefully sterilized.

Botulism is an acute poisoning caused by eating food in which bacillus botulinus has been growing. The sickness was first observed in people who had eaten partly decayed sausage. It is now known, however, that the poisoning does not always result from the eating of sausage, but that it may be connected with home canned string beans, peas, corn, asparagus, etc. The immediate cause of botulism is a powerful poison or toxin which is formed by bacillus botulinus in the cans. When canned foods containing this poison are eaten, very severe symptoms result.

Professor Dickson of the University of California reports very briefly the following case, which emphasizes the important characteristics of the disease: "On Friday Mrs. H. tasted a small portion of a bean pod from a jar of home canned string beans. The beans had a peculiar irritating taste, but she swallowed a small amount. The beans were placed on the stove to cook and gave off such a foul odor that they were discarded. On Saturday Mrs. H. was dizzy when she got out of bed and staggered when she walked. By afternoon visions were blurred in both eyes and a physician was called. She stated that there had been no pain nor gastro-intestinal disturbances and that she had not been nauseated.

"Examination showed a dilation of both pupils and a pulse rate of 100 per minute. After midnight the patient complained that her tongue was swollen and she began to have difficulty in speaking. On Sunday morning there was a drooping of the upper eyelids from paralysis and beginning difficulty in swallowing. Speech rapidly became unintelligible and vomiting commenced. Toward Sunday evening the temperature approached 102 with a pulse rate varying between 98 and 120. The patient became rapidly weaker with an increased pulse rate and died Tuesday morning about 88 hours after eating the beans."

It should not be inferred that home packed foods are always dangerous or that canned foods which have spoiled contain this powerful poison. However, it is known that such foods may cause this trouble, greater care may be taken in preparing the food. Numerous instances are recorded where the housewife merely tasted of the food. The poison is very quickly destroyed by boiling.
